Japan is amidst a new building revolution, using smart technologies to take its infrastructure into the future in a way that cares for changing societal and environmental challenges. DAI-DAN, a company specializing in mechanical and electrical services for buildings, is one such leading company leveraging digital technologies to provide smarter buildings. With an ability to work on small and large buildings with its expertise as a mechanical and electrical contractor, DAI-DAN specializes in clean environment facilities for pharmaceutical regenerative medicine. In this interview, president Ichiro Fujisawa, discusses Zero Energy Buildings and how DAI-DAN is providing smart facilities to cater for changing needs, as well as some of the company's projects, such as Cellab Tonomachi, a base for regenerative medicine and for cell culture processing, and Cellab Healthcare Services.

In the last 25 years Japanese manufacturers have been put under pressure from regional competitors in China, South Korea, and Taiwan that have replicated the Japanese monozukuri
